

Some people are becoming more interested in family history research. Others argue we should focus on the present and future generation.

Discuss both views and give your opinion.

That family roots play an inevitable role in mankind's background is indisputable. Whereas some tend to search (delve into) deeply through their ancestors' past, others assert that concentrating on the contemporary era would be more beneficial.

Our families' history is an unavoidable part of our identity in that a major part of everyone's characteristics as well as physical appearance are transformed by genes of both parents and their forefathers. Therefore, gaining such information could usefully contribute to a higher self-knowledge which would enable us to improve our weak points to reach-grow more confident and reach general health. For instance, a person with a high risk of depression among their family's members could start participating in psychotherapy sessions from a young age. Moreover, what these investigations might bring about is pride and joy in case of any story related to a successful achievement or victory in a war. These samples could strengthen family ties and give the m the required the power to endure difficult situations. (much needed)

Nowadays, with the emergence of technology, the method of living has radically changed compared to past. Thus, adapting to the ever-changing modern lifestyle is a key to success. The more adaptation, the higher the chance of the provision of self-satisfaction. As many technophiles often concede, not only does our future prosperity completely depend s on technically advanced inventions, studying any subjects about past should be broadly banned because it would be a total waste of time and energy. One salient example is the invention of robots which dates back to 20th century and was a huge game changer. Humans desperately need such leaps in order to continue their existence and fulfill their zeal for perusing life on other planets which will not happen just by focusing on the past.

In brief, from my perspective, the only true solution for having a well-developed society would be emphasizing ~~on~~ morality and other positive attitudes of our past generations in addition to upgradinge the whole aspects of life from educational systems to our individual's possessions positively affected by technology simultaneously.
