

Decades ago, broadening your family's business was not a matter to cast doubt on, and people were much more likely to do as the same things their family did for a living as well. As time went by, people were more reluctant to do so and they have struggled with this for many years and now, as we see the majority of people choose their own ways. A decent subject to think of is whether that is it is actually better for people to choose their own ways or not. From my vantage point, people having jobs like their parents might not have any advantages necessarily. I have reasons to support my claim among which difference in talent or desires and the right to make choices, stand out and will be explained in the essay.

The point I want to make here the first point is that children are capable of having different talents or have passion for paths much diverse from those their parents stepped in. I stand for the opinion that, achievement of success and satisfaction, is closely dependent on one's prospering in one's own unique role in this world. Talent and passion, I think, are two most important factors in this regard, and as I have mentioned, children might vary from their parents. As an example, I have seen many parents who were doctors, whose children became successful artists. One of these cases was my very own friend, at first their parents led her to study in medical school, but after two years she came out of the medical college and started taking painting courses. After two years she became a very successful painter. So following parents' way is not necessarily helpful.

The other reason I think having the same job as parents will not be key to one's success, is that every individual is born with the right to make choices for his life. Another matter that concerns the point of making choices, is taking responsibilities of choices. If people find their own way regardless of what their parents does, in addition to passion and talent, the other important factor in their success is that they must take the responsibility for the way they chose to step in. So in this way, I think they are committed to their path in a way, and that would help them to go forward although many obstacles might arise in this path.

All in all, as people are getting more aware these days, they are more eager to follow their own dreams. It can be easily foreseen that people by picking their interests and making efforts in those fields, societies will be much more harmonious in a not too distant a future.
